ASSET PROTECTION ATTORNEYS

If you're sued, can you simply hide your international cash in an international bank account?

International banking records are normally privacy protected against U.S. court orders and subpoenas, and international financial centers banks are jurisdictionally immune to service of process. IFC's banks cannot divulge your financial information to third parties except as permitted under narrow treaty provision. Because international banks are jurisdictionally immune to service of process, they can also ban U.S. writs of execution or attachment orders. The privacy laws of most IFC's can protect funds from creditor seizure originating from a U.S. judgement. They can also protect the confidentiality of financial transaction passing through the bank. Still, you need a protective entity - such as an international trust or international LLC - to protect yourself against a U.S. turnover or disgorgement order.
