If you move to a new state, do you have to change your Estate Plan?

That question depends on the state you move from. Estate planning law originates from state law. That means each state has its own set of guidelines for how estate plans can be set-up and executed. That being said, some states have similar laws and others are drastically different. Also, most states have estate taxes for estates that are over a certain dollar amount (which should be accounted for in the planning) and other states, such as Florida, do not. Florida property must only be under the federal exemption, which is approximately $5,340,000 (as of 2014).
