ASSET PROTECTION ATTORNEYS

When can an employee rely upon an employer's liability coverage?

Contrary to assumption, your employer's insurance also may not adequately protect you. For example, an employer's insurer may not be obliged to defend or pay a judgment against the employee. Employers ordinarily and automatically share liability with their negligent employee; therefore, a judgment against the employee usually brings a simultaneous judgment against the employer. The employer's liability would be paid by the insurer, which would normally cover the employee. That's the theory. Nevertheless, employees who rely solely on their employer's coverage run several risks.
